The Jill Roe Regional History Award is supported by:

The HCNSW's Jill Roe bequest funds.

The History Council of NSW introduced the Jill Roe Regional History Award in 2022, named in honour of Professor Jill Roe (1940-2017), an outstanding and pioneering Australian historian. The purpose of the Award is to encourage historians at any stage of their careers to discover, analyse, and explore rural and regional Australian history, helping to increase academic and public engagement in a topic that has ongoing relevance to Australian history and society today.

The winner will receive a citation and a prize of $500. The winning entry will make an original and compelling argument using primary historical sources and demonstrate the capacity to develop complex arguments, linking the past to contemporary rural and regional issues that have had or are currently having an impact on Australian communities.

Submissions can take the form of:

- an essay up to 6,000 words, an academic paper, or article up to 6,000 words (footnotes or similar referencing required, but not counted in word-count) not previously published;
- work extracted from a larger form (e.g., a thesis) up to 6,000 words (footnotes required, but not counted in word-count) cast in a self-contained, free-standing format; or
- a multi-media submission of any form including podcasts, videos, exhibitions, or websites, accompanied by an exegesis (up to 1,000 words; footnotes or similar referencing required, but not counted in word-count) explaining content, purpose, and outcomes as appropriate.

- For submissions with multiple episodes, or long run-times (over approximately 20 to 30 minutes) please highlight which episode/s, time-stamps, etc. are best examples of the work and the argument/s made within as explained in your exegesis, as judges will not have time to comprehensively review all episodes in longer series.

² The intention of this rule is to reward and encourage work from under-supported historians, such as students, early career researchers, community historians, and other historians who are not already paid to undertake historical research and writing within the academy.
